A humble man who tested isolation to the limit By ataylor@us.bnsmc.com This book which I read 3 years ago, has been an influence into both mine and my wife's lives. The book is factual, very gripping, humorous at times but overall a very in-depth view of a man who after two failed marriages set off at the age of 49 to find peace and see the world. His knowledge of sailing was very limited but over time experienced more of the elements the Oceans of the world have to offer than you could ever imagine. After many years at sea Les summarises what being alone actually means. I understand that Les has sailed around the world three times now, the first trip took twelve years which most of this book is about. The second trip non-stop, during the last month as he was returning back to the UK he was living on rice mixed with toothpaste to enhance its flavour. This is a true story of a humble man, living on a limited budget but had the most wonderful experiences of which most people/sailors only ever dream about, he endured the oceans at their worst which is well documented in the book Hands Open. A book if read will stay with you for ever.
